Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Bernie Sanders has been taking heat from his opponents over the publication of a $250,000 fine issued by the Internal Revenue Service over a student loan debt issued to his wife Jane Sanders in 2010. The IRS ruled the fine illegal and has sued the couple, citing a federal law that says a person is personally liable for a debt if they knowingly file a false tax return. The debt was for a student loan to Jane Sanders for her graduate school education at the University of Chicago, where she earned a master's degree in policy and administration in 1983. Sanders has argued that the debt was the result of an IRS administrative error. He has also said that he should not be made to personally pay because he was not aware of the debt until 2014, when his tax returns were first audited. More from NBC News: Analysis: How Bernie Sanders' Medicare for All plan could impact the Supreme Court Bernie Sanders draws heat over student loan debt and how he was fined for it Bernie Sanders' Medicare for All plan would eliminate private health insurance Sanders told MSNBC's "Morning Joe" program on Thursday that he has not paid the fine because he has not received any notices from the IRS and the debt has not been collected. However, a source close to the Sanders campaign told the Washington Examiner that Bernie Sanders has paid the fine. The source also said that Bernie Sanders has sought legal representation on the matter and that the fine has been canceled. At the same time, the Sanders campaign released a news release from Jane Sanders and C-SPAN's "Washington Journal" program on Wednesday claiming that the debt remains in place, but the Sanders campaign said that Jane Sanders has paid off the student loan.
